Lesson 18: Endangered Species

Endangered Species

Hello and welcome to the eighteenth lesson of IELTS Up Words! I have my pet bird here with me while recording this lesson. It's a beautiful blue budgie and I love him so much! Do you own a pet too? As you know, pets have been tamed. They are not like animals in the wild. They have become domesticated to keep humans company—to become humans' friends.

But not all animals can be kept as pets. Most of them are wild and live in their natural habitats. They live in jungles and mountains and prey on smaller animals or insects. Some are predators and some prey. But the biggest danger to all of these animals is posed by us humans. We have endangered and driven many animals into extinction, mostly by poaching them or keeping them in captivity. But it is not all sad and gloomy because I think people are becoming more and more aware and compassionate. They are also putting more pressure on governments to take action and protect endangered species.

And as for today's question, I am going to ask you to talk about governments' roles in protecting endangered animals. Listen to the question and answer it the best way you can.

Do you think governments are doing enough to protect endangered animals?

No, I definitely don't—at least not in my country. The government does nothing for the sake of the endangered species. It still grants permission to factories to be built in animal territories, does not enforce new laws to prosecute poachers, and does not allocate enough budget to build more wildlife reserves. This is why many species are on the verge of extinction here.

Speaking Tip

Avoiding Repetition

In the previous lessons, we discussed the importance of answering directly to the question asked by the examiner. This is especially true for the first part of speaking which is called "the interview." It is better not to change too many of the words in the question in the first part of your answer so that your response sounds natural and clear. However, you should avoid repeating the same words in the rest of your response. Repetition indicates that your range of vocabulary is not flexible enough, which will cause you to lose marks.

Take a look at these two sample answers and tell me which one is going to lose marks.

Sample 1: What was your favorite animal when you were a child?

As a child, my favorite animal was a unicorn. I thought unicorns were cute animals, and I didn't know that they were not real animals when I was a child.

Sample 2: What was your favorite animal when you were a child?

As a child, my favorite animal was a unicorn. I didn't know it was a fictional creature back then and, therefore, would always picture myself finding one, riding it, and petting its mane.
