IELTS Up Words!

Lesson 78: The News

Hello there! Welcome to lesson seventy-eight of IELTS Up Words!

Do you consume an excessive amount of news? Did you know that it is bad for you? Why? For several reasons. First, partisan news stories and discussions cause stress and frustration. When a certain news outlet supports a certain political party, it uses words that have a negative undertone to describe the other parties or, even worse, launches scathing attacks on its opponents. This biased language makes us increasingly polarized. Second, repeated negative news stories make us feel unsafe. Because negative or controversial headlines outperform positive headlines, journalists go out of their way to come up with screaming headlines to capture the public's interest. And therefore, by flicking through the news that is mostly negative, our sense of safety deteriorates. And finally, the news might sometimes deceive us. Due to the rise in fake news, it is not uncommon to come across misinformation now and then. Fake news websites are lurking everywhere, and these fraudulent websites typically publish propaganda and false information that usually go viral by getting picked up by social media channels and accounts. Overall, we need to limit our intake of news to avoid being conditioned or manipulated by them or other TV programs because not all news is impartial.

Now, let's answer two part-three questions together. Ready?

Is local news important?

I think it is. Local publications play a vital role in delivering valuable news to their communities, so without these pieces of news, local people might face a lot of difficulties. For example, if they don't have a reliable source of information to notify them of nearby crime activities or changes in the weather, they might get into trouble. Plus, local news can also work as a medium to promote community gatherings or projects, bringing the people closer and creating a sense of belonging.

How easy is it for broadcasters and media outlets to manipulate public opinion?

I guess, these days, it has become quite easy to do so. This is especially blatant during political elections when the media is used by a lot of politicians to spread rumors about their opponents to portray them as incompetent leaders. This manipulation can happen in various ways; for example, through the means of humor. In other words, they sometimes make jokes about people who want to enter the political arena to convey underlying messages and influence public opinion. Another instance is when they want to promote an idea or a product. They sometimes use the technique of repetition to influence the masses and get their message across. For example, we see Coca Colas being used and shown repeatedly in so many movies nowadays, which can have a subconscious effect.
